PHILADELPHIA—The National Museum of American Jewish History (NMAJH) welcomed teachers from across the country to its second annual National Educators Institute, The Art and Science of Teaching Jewish History in America, from Sunday, July 9 through Wednesday, July 12. The first-of-its-kind Institute is a professional development program designed to empower secondary-level Jewish day school and Hebrew school teachers to transform—and sometimes initiate—the teaching of American Jewish history in their classrooms by utilizing the trove of artifacts and resources available at NMAJH.

“As a leading institution creatively teaching, interpreting, and inspiring dialogue about the American Jewish experience, NMAJH is dedicated to bringing the lessons of this Museum to classrooms across the country,” says NMAJH’s Senior Manager of Education & Interpretation, Ronit Lusky. “Through the Institute, we are spearheading the effort to give teachers invaluable tools to help students understand and identify themselves within the larger arc of American Jewish history.”

This year’s Institute attracted 14 participants from 6 states—including California, Colorado, Illinois, New York, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania—representing secondary-level teachers (grades 5-12) from both Jewish day schools and Hebrew schools. Direction was provided by Ronit Lusky (NMAJH) and leading scholars of Jewish history and education Dr. Benjamin M. Jacobs (George Washington University) and Dr. Jonathan Krasner (Brandeis University). Additional notable faculty included preeminent scholar of American Jewish history and NMAJH’s Chief Historian Dr. Jonathan Sarna (Brandeis University), Dr. Jenna Weissman Joselit (George Washington University), and Dr. Abby Reisman (University of Pennsylvania).

One educator reflected on the experience: “I expected to learn from experts in the field the broad themes associated with American Jewish history...We were blown away by their depth of knowledge and passion for the subject.” Others noted, “The program has exceeded my expectations,” and “I am very impressed with all the amazing information and lectures, […] individual attention, and more.”

The intensive four-day long program exposed educators to new developments in the fields of both history education and American Jewish history scholarship, and to new educational concepts that combine a historical approach together with a social-emotional learning. Teachers benefitted from workshops aimed at developing their curricula and discussing educational strategies with each other. The various lectures, panels, and workshops included “Core Themes in American Jewish History,” “Four Tensions in American Jewish life through Museum Objects,” “The Power of Paired Learning,” “Reading Like a Historian,” and more.
After finding inspiration from the speakers and workshops, the teachers then proposed and began developing projects outlining ways to truly immerse their students in American Jewish history. They will continue developing or begin implementing their projects during Academic Year 2017-2018, with support from NMAJH educators. Participants will be encouraged to submit results of their projects to NMAJH’s National Educational Resources for Teaching American Jewish History database and join the growing network of educators that use Museum resources, share innovative lessons, and collaborate across school departments and state lines.
